Cost-effectiveness of imaging in the evaluation of suspected appendicitis in children: a decision analysis. We evaluated the cost-effectiveness of computed tomography (CT) and ultrasonography (US) in the initial evaluation of children with suspected appendicitis. A decision analysis model was constructed using data collected from a randomized controlled trial of 519 children undergoing both US and CT for appendicitis. CT was assumed to be more sensitive than US, but with a higher rate of radiation-induced cancer. Our model incorporated expected costs and health benefits. Sensitivity analyses explored the effect of varying assumptions about patient compliance, radiation exposure, and cancer induction. Based on mean costs and effects, CT is cost-effective in all age groups if the cost is greater than $50 per life-year gained. In children under age 10, US is cost-effective if the cost is less than $150 per 82157476af
